Farmers, ranchers discuss food, farm concerns at annual meeting

Voting delegates continue to steer through transportation issues to better address movement of agricultural commodities during Texas Farm Bureau's (TFB) 86th Annual Meeting in San Antonio.

Delegates approved policy that would require stakeholders involved in road and bridge projects to consider accommodating agricultural equipment during the design and construction.

"Agricultural equipment is large, bulky and extremely heavy. Considering how that equipment moves when designing, building or repairing roads, bridges and intersections would be beneficial for everyone traveling on the road," TFB President Russell Boening said.

They also supported eliminating mileage restrictions for farmers and ranchers transporting their own products. Delegates stamped their position on non-GMO labeling, approving language that details marketing and labeling of products as non-GMO only when the GMO variety of that commodity actually exists.

"There are only 10 genetically-modified crops," Boening said. "It's false marketing to label crops as non-GMO when that product doesn't exist. It creates unnecessary fear about our food."

Delegates voted to support efforts related to mental health awareness, programs and community outreach.

During the business session, the committee also discussed the cattle fever tick and the impact the tick could have on the state's cattle industry.

They voted for mandatory notification and approval by the Texas Animal Health Commission in order to move any captured game or exotic animal that may be susceptible to the devastating fever tick.

Delegates registered support of educational efforts on unintended consequences caused by balloon releases and plastic litter.

"The unfortunate reality is that balloons end up causing damage to agriculture. Each balloon that is released puts livestock and horses at risk," Boening said. "Those balloons can even cause plastic contamination of other crops."

Tax assessments and rural appraisals were also discussed. Delegates voted to change the eligibility for tax assessment for new agricultural land to three years from the current five years.
