...Texas cotton crop

"It generally seems to be in the drier years, but especially if we have a fairly wet spring, then they'll have a good hatch from their eggs, and we see these larger populations."

Landowners can spray the edges of their pastures and field margins down to reduce the number of lubbers.

"The biggest issue we have is that when they're migrating in these larger numbers, then it's going to take more than one application to keep the grasshoppers under control," Easterling said.

In addition to the lubbers in Glasscock County, large numbers of the insects have been seen on U.S. Highway 87 between Big Spring and San Angelo and on State Highway 158 from Glasscock County toward Sterling City.

"We're seeing large numbers being run over on the road," Easterling said. "We're seeing a few spots in Reagan County just south of Glasscock County."

Easterling said there may be places where people see three or four lubbers coming out of pastures, but it's nothing like the thousands that have moved into other areas.

In other parts of the state, it's bollworms that threaten Texas cotton.

Kate Harrell, Texas A&M AgriLife Extension Service agent-Integrated Pest Management for Wharton, Jackson and Matagorda counties, urges farmers to scout their fields when the cotton blooms.

"I recommend doing full plant checks. I know it's a lot more trouble, but if you look up and down all of the plants, you can tell," Harrell said. "A lot of the time, they lay eggs on bloom tags and in different places in the plant."
