Fall Army Worms

By Morgan Runyan

Fall army worms have shown up in West Texas. If you have wheat planted and it's up to a stand, I would encourage you to scout closely for Fall Army Worms and their damage. They can reduce a small grain stand quickly. They do not prefer the heat of the day so a good time to go look through fields would be early in the morning while it is still cool or just before dusk in the evening. These worms can travel long distances as they consume forage so check thoroughly and frequently.

Fall army worms (FAW) can easily be found in many wheat, coastal and Bermuda grass fields right now. FAW moths deposit egg masses in seedling small grains and other monocot crops. Small larvae feed on the leaf tissue, creating tiny "window panes" in the leaves. Larger larvae consume entire leaves. Control is suggested when they are four or more larvae 1-inch or longer per square foot and when their damage is threatening the plant stand. Wet weather can bring on exploding populations like we are currently experiencing.

Description: The larvae are usually shades of brown but may also be greenish to nearly black. Four distinct black spots are on top of the eighth abdominal segment, and a white inverted Y is on the front of the head. Mature larvae are 1 1/2-inches long.

Insecticides containing pyrethroid as an active ingredient are recommended. Recommended treatments are Mustang Max and Tombstone insecticides. They work very well and provide about 6-8 days of residual. Be sure to follow all label instructions, paying particular attention to the hay cutting and/or grazing restrictions listed on any insecticide products.
